"They were planted when Wilson Park was just beginning." Polivick said "It's our responsibility now to containe this thing and get some young guys planted so that 75 years from now our grandchildren can enjoy them too.

"That's our job, to provide that kind of setting for these people living in an industrial area," he said. "We try to give people a feeling of recreation and relaxation — a place to go to get away from the hustle and bustle of the city.

"There aren't many places you can go and set among a couple of hundred trees," he added. "That's beginning to be rare commodity."

If your potting mix in the tray begins to dry out, water it thoroughly. If your seeds are small or very fine, don't pour water over the top of the potting mix. You'll just bury or wash away the seeds, Instead, fill a flatbottom sink, (your kitchen sink or laundry tub should do the trick) with one to two inches of water. Set the container in the water. Letting the mix soak up the moisture. When the top of the soil glistens with water drops, it's moist enough.

Once seeds begin to germinate, remove the plastic covering. Then you can place the seedlings in full sun or six to eight inches below fluorescent lights. Keep the potting mix moist, but not soaking wet. Young seedlings are very sensitive to moisture: too much or too little can kill them. Feed them a liquid plant lood at the rate recommended for the seedlings.

The very first leaves that will appear are the food leaves (cotyledons). They are a temporary food source and almost always fall off once "true" leaves appear. When two sets of true leaves emerge, you can thin plantlets or transplant seedlings into individual pots.

To transplant seedlings, fill a clean container with a moist, peat-lite potting mix. Then, using a plant label or pencil, gently lift the seedling from its container. Handle the seedling by one true leaf or the root ball, not by the stem. It's fragile and easily crushed. Set the seedling in the hole at the depth it was previously growing, and gently firm the mix around the roots. Continue to rovide light, water and Seedlings should be "hardened off" before you plant them outside. When we say "hardening off" we mean getting them acclimated to their new environment a little at a time. Start by placing the seedling outdoors for a few hours in a shaded spot that is sheltered from the wind, then bring them back indoors. Each day, lengthen the time they spend outdoors. After seven to ten days, you can transplant them into containers, flower beds, vegetable gardeners, or anywhere else.

Late afternoon and cloudy days are the best times to transplant seedlings. Plants should be set into the should be set into the ground at the same depth they were growing in their containers. Gently firm the soil around the plants. If you use peat pots, peel back the lip so it is below the soil surface. Refer to the seed packet to determine proper

Transplants should be Transplants should be watered immediately after being placed in the ground. If you didn't mix a fertilizer with the soil, then apply a water-soluble plant food such as Miracle Gro. If any late frosts are predicted, the seedlings should be covered with burlap, newspaper, old sheets or blankets. Don't use plastic, though!

Once the plants have been transplanted, you can sit back, relax, and admire your efforts. And think about different varieties you can start next winter!
